Long-term oral administration of zinc oxide (ZnO) nanoparticles is supposed to reduce the gastrointestinal mucosa barrier function and the integrity of the gut, as well as the resistance to infectious organisms. The studies addressed the interplay of ZnO nanoparticles and Zn ions, which are essential trace elements for human well-being. The key role in the immunomodulatory effects of nanomaterials has been attributed to ZnO, while its immunological mechanisms are far from being sufficiently understood. The novelty of this study is a comparative analysis of the influence of ZnO and Zn nanoparticles on the progression of infection and the level of pro- and anti-inflammatory cytokines in the mouse peritoneal macrophages, as well as their effect on phagocytic capacity, oxidative burst, and NOS2 protein production. Interactions of ZnO nanoparticles with peritoneal macrophages were mostly associated with a decrease in the phagocytic capacity of macrophages, a decreased activity of intracellular antioxidant enzyme superoxide dismutase, and the decreased production of nitric oxide. In contrast, Zn ions decreased the phagocytic capacity of cells and the production of inducible NO synthase, which could also be a reason for the pro-inflammatory potential of Zn. Zn ions and ZnO nanoparticles had no effect on the oxidative burst activity of the macrophages. Overall, ZnO nanoparticles but not Zn ions decreased the release of

---

proinflammatory
cytokines and the phagocytic capacity of peritoneal macrophages, which led us to conclude that ZnO nanoparticles may have a protective effect
